Not illustrated. 1880 Excerpt: . . . oft contracted here, While grovelling in some animal pursuit, Till Poesy refines lifes moral sphere And lifts the man once more above the brute. Such was the lofty aim of Miltons verse; Whose soul communed with God upon His throne, And heard archangels in his dreams rehearse Redemptions plan--and that on man alone Depends the hope that bliss may be his own--Through love fraternal, and the hope of heaven, That so his spirit may in death be known As one who hath in life sublimely striven. And so the rustic bard of Coila rose, To throw a spell around the human heart And sympathise with all its joys and woes, In homely strains devoid of laboured art; While with an eye that flashed the lightnings dart He scathed oppression with indignant scorn, And acting nobly lifes heroic part--His genius blest the poor and lowly born. LOVE,...
