As is always the case in the Prussian manoeuvres the great object was to turn the enemy s flank--in this instance his left flank. The advance guard, therefore, as it came into action deployed, and the artillery, which occupied a commanding position in the rear, opened fire. The cavalry of the advance guard, composed of one uhlan regiment, took up a position in echelon on the flank, and the infantry were thrown forward according to the principles of the new drill. The great object being to hold the enemy in check on the extreme right while the main attack was developed on his left, every precaution was taken to strengthen the position of the attacking force on that side; skirmishers advanced to the front, lay down and fired; about 120 paces in the rear their supports dug shelter trenches in irregular order offering gaps and enabling them to support each other. In easy soil the trenches were dug and shelter was obtained in about ten minutes. The supports in the rear remained in a concealed position, while the remainder of the army gradually developed its force, and gradually brought fresh and fresh troops up in M1elon on the enemy s left, driving him back with irresistible force and turning his entire position. I had left Berlin by an early train and eight o clock found me toiling along a sandy road towards the broad swift river Havel. At the time the action commenced I...
