Excerpt: . . . give them once a year Christmas turkeys and cheap candy to eat. Children who were so fortunate as to be born into the world without parents (except such as an ashbarrel and a policeman provide), or who were successful in getting rid of what parents they had through the agency of the criminal court, or through divine intervention, were collected in orphan asylums by the old fashioned philanthropists, and it was easy to understand exactly what compensation these gentlemen obtained in the exercise of their benevolent faculties. They could stand at one end of a great hall surveying long tables crowded with hungry newsboys and derive immense satisfaction from seeing the food disappear and the boys fill up. It caused unquestionably a pleasant sensation to stand there and reflect that these boys, hungry all the year, would be still hungrier today-- if had not provided this magnificent dinner for them. The year of previous hunger would of course on both sides be a highly important factor in producing the pleasurable sensations. The same gendemen on entering their favorite orphan asylums as devoted benefactors would derive similar sensations every time they contemplated the rows of neatly aproned crop headed orphans. All this is very easy to understand. Philanthropic rich people are not always so easy to understand. There is a type of rich man who is benevolent on an entirely different scale. This man undertakes to improve whole neighborhoods of poor people. He builds free...
