MANCHESTER UNIVERSITY PRESS, United Kingdom, 2002. Hardback. Book Condition: New. 211 x 160 mm. Language: English . Brand New Book. This is an examination of the internationalist ambitions of American women s organisations in the years 1945 to 1960. After World War II, American women believed that they must have a more active role in world affairs, asserting that their internationalism was vital to secure a peaceful future. However, in the emerging Cold War, American women s loyalty to their European sisters was quickly replaced by their loyalty to their nation. This book reveals that in confronting a propaganda campaign from Soviet-backed women s organisations, American women tried to export a vision of the American way of life and of women s proper place within it. Additionally, the author asserts that American women were supported by their government, from advice and direction through to the financial backing of the CIA.
