Not illustrated. 1891 Excerpt: . . . perpetrated by non-technical papers, and which they are unconscious of until some one points it out to them; then it is a typographical error. If papers that know nothing about engineering will persist in reporting matters for engineers, they must expect to be laughed at when they make gross blunders, as they do constantly, and they should not cry when they are laughed at. Moreover, dear brother of the press, we did not embrace the opportunity to declare ourself on the oil fuel question. That has long ago been settled without any ukase from us. When coal can be had at 3 50 per ton, it is folly to use oil for steam purposes; but there are still a few who keep on trying experiments, as they call them, when their mercantile and mechanical friends in the same trades elsewhere have found out that it is...
