Americans residing there, a Chinese domicil could be It is true that, instead of an edict declaring the law, the Emperor by consent permitted Congress to extend its statutes to the government of Americans in this treaty port. In other words, if the identical laws which now govern Americans upon this territory had been promulgated by edict, instead of permitted by treaty, the estate of the decedent would, without question, have been conceded a domicil in Shanghai. Now then as a practical question what logical reason can be given for declaring the existence of domicil in the one case and not in the other The decedent would have lived under precisely the same laws and upon the same foreign soil. Although the Emperor had suspended some of the Chinese laws and permitted the extension of American law to the territory, yet the source of...
